Letter From The Executive Director

INNOVATION

Dear Friends,

Innovation.

It's a word that gets tossed around a lot. New packaging, a lower hemline - almost anything is enough for our trend-obsessed culture to slap on the label of "innovation." But what does it mean? Isn't it more than a surface-level change? How do we keep true innovation alive?

At the Urban Justice Center, we are always looking for new ways to approach the seemingly intractable problem of poverty. Some of our Projects focus on providing assistance to a specific community (ex. the mentally ill, the homeless); others on a specific type of advocacy (ex. human rights work, community development). But in each project and throughout the agency as a whole, we are always searching for new solutions. This is how we grew from a one-person operation to an eight-project advocacy organization with sixty people on staff. Constant innovation is the secret to our record of creating critical legal and legislative change.

Indeed, the UJC's basic structure is designed to foster creativity and measurable results. In exchange for raising the funds to support their work, we give our Project Directors unequaled control over the operations of their Projects - establishing goals, devising methods, and hiring staff. This heightened responsibility gives our advocates an unprecedented sense of ownership over their work, and motivates them to use their intelligence, energy, and creativity for the betterment of our clients.

And we continue to grow to meet the challenges our clients face. This year we created the "Innovations in Social Justice Award." This award will stimulate exciting ideas and support the start-up of a new Project, which will take a fresh angle on the fight for social justice. The competition will draw the most capable advocates to vie for a spot at the UJC. We are excited about bringing in new ideas and talents to our already impressive staff of lawyers, researchers, social workers, and other advocates.

This new Project will join us in our new space downtown. Until recently, our staff was split between many floors in the same building, hampering our work and our ability to expand. Now, our entire office is housed on a single floor of 123 William Street. Integrating our office has strengthened our internal community - an important value at the UJC. It allows us to take advantage of the synergy that comes from working in close proximity to each other. This base of support allows us to work together elegantly and creatively, and we look forward to the dividends we will reap from this new configuration in coming years.

Innovation.

It means never going stale; never giving up. Searching for solutions that actually work and adapting our strategies to meet the real concerns of the people for whom we advocate.

It's what we do. The following pages provide the best evidence that our unique efforts yield real results. You will see changed lives and improved systems - all for the most marginalized and forgotten members of our society. But it only happens with your support. On behalf of myself, the staff of the Urban Justice Center, and our clients, I thank you for joining with us in the fight for social justice.

Sincerely,

Douglas Lasdon,
Executive Director

What We Do

The Urban Justice Center serves New York City's most vulnerable residents through a combination of direct legal services, systemic legal advocacy, community education and community organizing. With a budget of over $5 million, we assist our clients on numerous levels, from one-on-one legal advice in soup kitchens, to helping individuals access housing and government assistance, to class action lawsuits to bring forth systemic change.

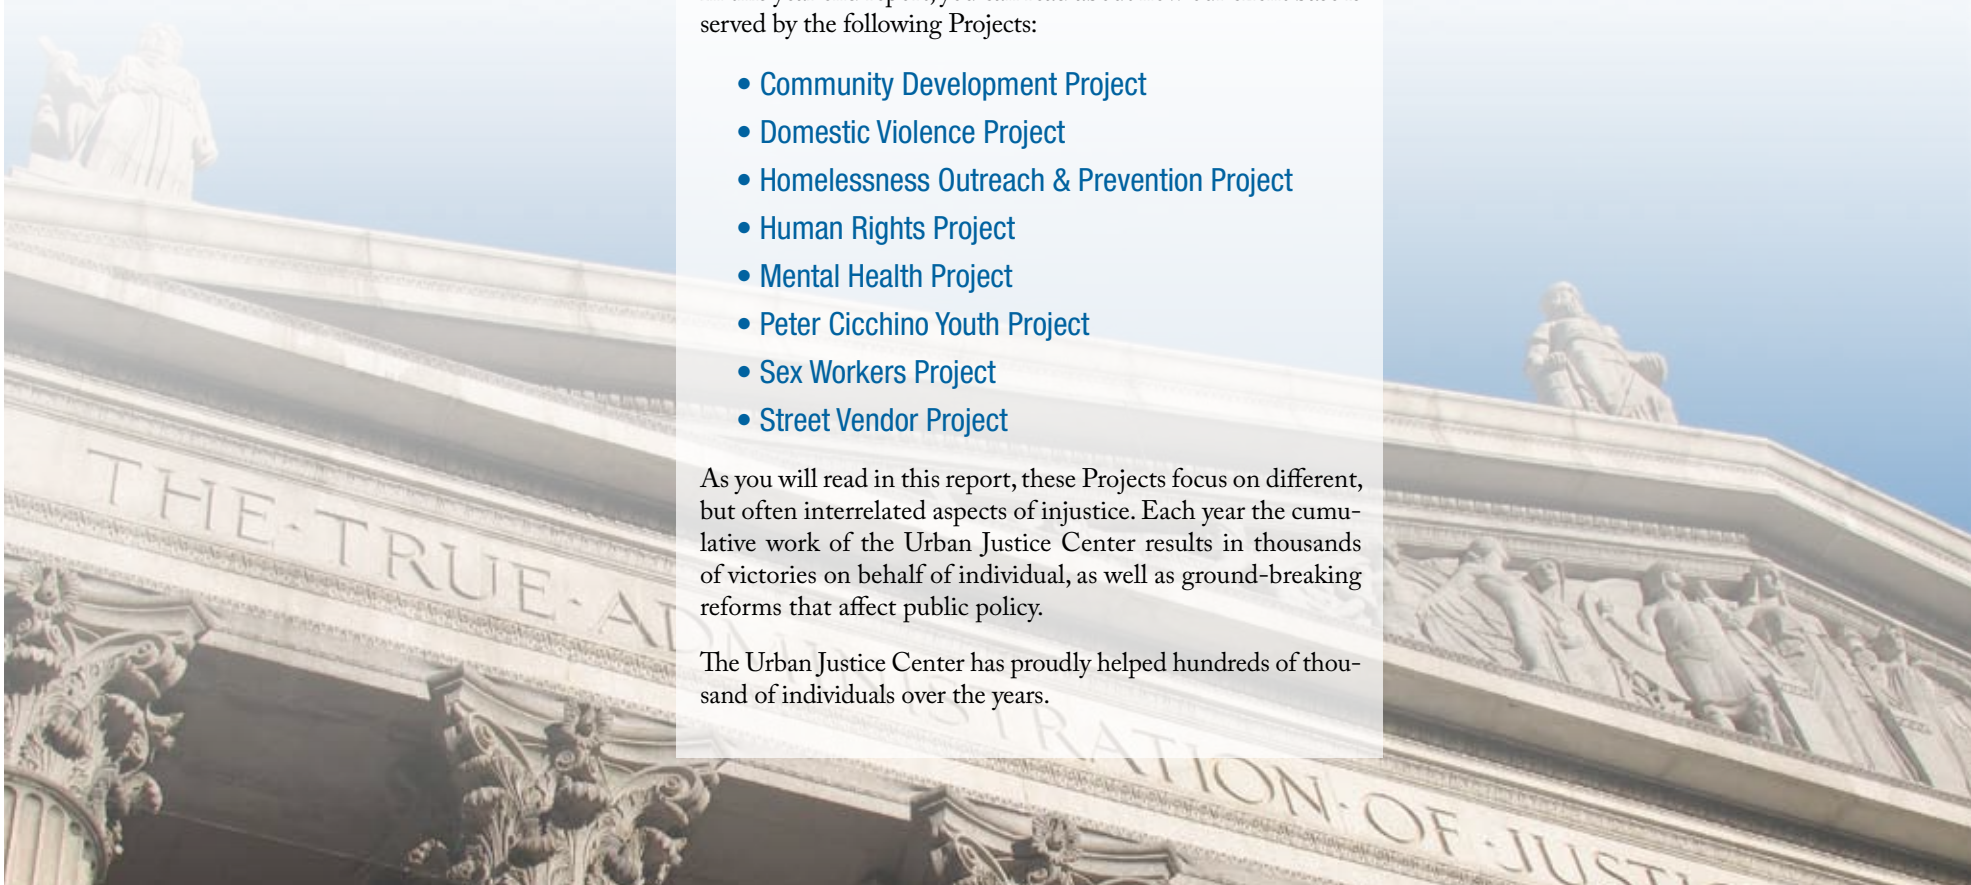

The Urban Justice Center represents an extraordinary array of the most deprived and abused people in our society, including members of the working poor, and on issues related to discrimination and oppression. We implement creative and intelligent strategies that enable us to provide desperately needed legal services and advocacy to unrepresented and under-represented groups and individuals in New York City.

In this year end report, you can read about how our client base is served by the following Projects:

- Community Development Project
- Domestic Violence Project
- Homelessness Outreach & Prevention Project
- Human Rights Project
- Mental Health Project
- Peter Cicchino Youth Project
- Sex Workers Project
- Street Vendor Project

As you will read in this report, these Projects focus on different, but often interrelated aspects of injustice. Each year the cumulative work of the Urban Justice Center results in thousands of victories on behalf of individual, as well as ground-breaking reforms that affect public policy.

The Urban Justice Center has proudly helped hundreds of thousand of individuals over the years.

Community Development Project

The Community Development Project (CDP) takes the Urban Justice model of creating positive social change for individuals, and applies it to grassroots community groups by providing legal, technical, research and policy assistance. CDP's work is informed by the belief that real and lasting change in low-income, urban neighborhoods is often rooted in the empowerment of grassroots, community institutions.

Every year, CDP works with more than 50 community organizations around New York City, whose total membership is in the thousands. CDP helps grassroots groups get off the ground, by doing everything from helping them write their bylaws, to advising them on how to avoid predatory lending institutions. By empowering groups within the community, CDP fosters long-range change that cannot be imposed from the outside.

Justice Will Be Served: Supporting Low-Wage Worker Organizing

For several years, CDP has collaborated with community organizations on Justice Will Be Served, a campaign to reform the way the restaurant industry treats its workers, especially low-income, immigrant workers in "back of the house" and delivery jobs. Over time, CDP and its partner organizations have developed an effective strategy of targeting the most egregiously abusive employers with a combination of litigation, picketing and media attention to expose illegal employment practices that include tip stealing, unpaid overtime, and failure to pay minimum wage. In 2007, this legal, organizing and public education work came to a head with several high-profile cases, including one in which CDP and pro bono attorneys won nearly $700,000 for a group of 11 wait staff at the 88 Palace restaurant in Chinatown. This work has had a profound effect on the restaurant industry, as we have received several reports of restaurants voluntarily ending illegal employment practices and improving the way they treat their workers after seeing coverage of Justice Will Be Served efforts in the media.

Addressing the Health Impact of 9/11 on Low-Income Communities

Since 2002 CDP has been a member of the Beyond Ground Zero (BGZ) network, a coalition of community organizations working to address the severe health and economic impact of the World Trade Center's collapse on Lower Manhattan's low-income communities. CDP participates in BGZ on multiple levels, providing legal, technical, research and policy expertise to advance BGZ's work on a number of fronts. BGZ has done some extraordinary things since its formation - such as founding a WTC treatment center at Bellevue Hospital for people with 9/11-related illness, and testifying before Congress about the health effects of 9/11 - and 2007 was no exception. Several of BGZ's main accomplishments this year include helping NYC's hospital system plan a $33 million expansion of the WTC treatment program in a way that is responsive to affected communities, registering nearly 300 Ground Zero clean-up workers for the NY State Workers' Compensation system, and convincing Congress to include downtown residents and workers in federal 9/11 health funding for the first time ever. Perhaps more than any other of CDP's efforts, Beyond Ground Zero is a testament to the immense, far-reaching impact that communities can have when they organize and make their voices heard.

For more information about BGZ, visit:
www.beyondgroundzero.org.

In November 2007 CDP released a ground-breaking report entitled "Debt Weight: The Consumer Credit Crisis in New York City and its Impact on the Working Poor", which reveals how debt collection companies are using the New York City Civil Court system to take unfair advantage of low-income consumers. In the coming year, CDP plans to address this injustice by advocating for legislative reform and expanding its representation of low-income New Yorkers who are struggling with consumer debt.

Domestic Violence Project

The Domestic Violence Project is dedicated to providing survivors of domestic violence and their children with the support and advocacy necessary to achieve freedom from the abuse and violence in their lives. Our mission demands a holistic approach in addressing the obstacles faced by our clients. The Domestic Violence Project uses a holistic approach to legal and social advocacy for victims of domestic violence.

Our dedicated and compassionate team of attorneys and clinicians work collaboratively to address the difficulties faced by our clients and their children by fully assessing each individual's clinical and legal needs. Our clients do not present with solely one issue. It is customary that the decision to leave is fraught with danger and uncertainty. We understand this, and we provide hotline assistance to victims of domestic violence where their concerns are heard and addressed.

The Domestic Violence Project's work incorporates a philosophy of collaboration. We believe that concerted efforts – governmental, law-enforcement, and the grass-roots level of smaller community based organizations – will provide the greatest impact. Collaboration provides for greater long-term societal change which in turn ensures greater safety and success for our clients and their children. We provide assistance to all victims of domestic violence irrespective of gender, and we provide culturally and linguistically appropriate services to victims of domestic violence.

OVER 8 MILLION INCIDENTS OF INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE OCCUR EACH YEAR

APPROXIMATELY 5.3 MILLION INCIDENTS AGAINST WOMEN

APPROXIMATELY 3.2 MILLION INCIDENTS AGAINST MEN

IN THE UNITED STATES

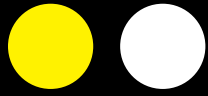

- Over 8 million incidents of intimate partner violence occur each year
- Approximately 5.3 million incidents against women
- Approximately 3.2 million incidents against men
- Approximately 50,000 women and 500,000 men in same-sex relationships are abused every year
- Persons living in households with lower annual incomes experienced the highest average annual rates.

TAKING ACTION

In an average month:

- 335 clients receive ongoing comprehensive clinical support and consultation
- 165 receive direct counseling
- 100 receive legal representation in the Family Court system
- 200 calls are made to the DVP hotline, the majority of who become clients

Homelessness Outreach & Prevention Project

IN THE PAST YEAR, THE HOMELESSNESS OUTREACH & PREVENTION PROJECT WON $2,302,964 IN GOVERNMENT BENEFITS FOR NEW YORKERS LIVING IN POVERTY.

DIRECT SERVICES

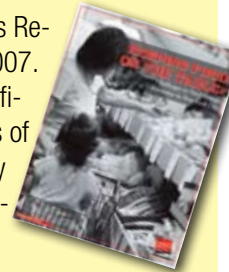

HOPP opened a new legal clinic in October 2007 at Yorkville Common Pantry in East Harlem.*

*Part of Robin Hood's Single Stop Initiative

2,000 households received direct service from HOPP's 8 free legal clinics in the past year.

RESEARCH

"Keeping Food on the Table: Challenges to Food Stamps Retention in New York City" was released in September 2007. This report examines the barriers to Food Stamp recertification and advocates for systemic change. The success of this second report on food stamps has helped to solidify our policy efforts, and we have been vigorously advocating for improvements to the system with both agency and elected officials.

IMPACT LITIGATION

Sierra v. City of New York, et al.

On July 27, 2007, HOPP filed a lawsuit in federal court alleging that a provision of the City's Housing Maintenance Code, which prohibits children between the ages of one and sixteen from residing in single residence occupancy (SRO) units, violates the Federal Fair Housing Act because it discriminates on the basis of familial status. The complaint also alleges that the landlord discriminated against the plaintiff in violation of both the Fair Housing Act and the New York State Human Rights Law, by using the discriminatory provision of the Housing Maintenance Code to try to evict the plaintiff.

With the decline in affordable housing throughout New York City, SROs have become one of the few remaining housing options for low-income individuals and families. Thus, this lawsuit seeks to ensure that landlords are not able to hide behind a discriminatory city code in their efforts to evict low-income families from affordable housing. The case will potentially impact hundreds of families with children currently living in SROs or who have been blocked from this type of housing.

The Homelessness Outreach and Prevention Project

(HOPP) advocates for economic justice for no and low income New Yorkers, including those who are homeless. Using a legal rights framework, HOPP conducts direct service, litigation, research and policy advocacy to preserve and expand access to public benefits programs and ensure government accountability.

One in five New York City residents lives in poverty, many of whom are working at low wage jobs. Some apply for government assistance, hoping for the aid our country promised them, only to find themselves unsure of their rights in a complex bureaucracy of rigid and confusing rules and regulations.

To assist individuals and families experiencing barriers in accessing public benefits, we operate free and easily accessible walk-in legal clinics throughout New York City. In October, we launched a new clinic at a food pantry in East Harlem. Currently we operate seven legal clinics at soup kitchens and food pantries: four in Manhattan and one each in Queens, Brooklyn and the Bronx. We also help public assistance recipients seeking access to education programs through our legal clinic at Hostos Community College in the Bronx. While some of the problems can be resolved through informal agency advocacy, in most cases, HOPP must represent clients at administrative hearings. The direct services we provide helps ground our impact litigation, research and policy advocacy efforts. For example, HOPP recently launched an advocacy plan aimed at ensuring access to appropriate child care for low-income New Yorkers and recovering child support payments for public assistance recipients that had been collected by the city but not distributed to the client. Further, with respect to access to education and training opportunities for public assistance recipients, we are expanding our advocacy to reach pregnant and parenting teenagers on public assistance who are transitioning from high school to post-secondary opportunities. Such efforts by HOPP helps to further ensure that our clients, and all low-income New Yorkers, have a real opportunity to lift themselves out of poverty.

Human Rights Project

The Human Rights Project is one of only a handful of organizations in the United States working to apply globally accepted human rights standards to domestic social policy. At its heart, the Human Rights Project is about using a model of organizing and advocacy that puts human dignity and human rights at the center of social justice work.

By using human rights, the Human Rights Project is changing the terms of the debate from charity to rights and focusing on government obligation to provide remedies where there are wrongs. Using a multi-pronged approach that connects the challenges of combating poverty and discrimination and using human rights standards where they provide more protection than domestic law, the Human Rights Project is working towards building a better, more responsive city government and more collective community voice. The Human Rights Project uses advocacy, media, education, and human rights documentation to advance our mission.

Human rights standards can provide a framework for analysis and an avenue of response to social injustice when national, state and local laws and processes fail. While U.S.-based groups with an international focus abound, we are one of only a handful of organizations in the United States working to analyze and respond to domestic social policy in this manner. In New York City, the Human Rights Project spearheads efforts to document, monitor, publicize and mobilize communities to respond to economic human rights violations.

1 OUT OF 5 NEW YORK CITY RESIDENTS LIVE BELOW THE FEDERAL POVERTY LINE.

In a historic effort, the Human Rights Project is coordinating a New York City report on race for submission to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) with over 30 local groups.

Mental Health Project

The Mental Health Project aims to break the cycle of hospitalization, homelessness, and incarceration for low-income New Yorkers with psychiatric disabilities. For 1,000 clients each year, our lawyers, social workers, and advocates stop evictions; win Social Security, Food Stamps, Medicaid and Public Assistance benefits; enforce the Americans with Disabilities Act; find mental health treatment; and force jails and hospitals to plan discharges so that psychiatric patients and inmates are not released to the street without housing, benefits, and ongoing treatment.

Based on what we learn from our clients, we pursue systemic legal change by engaging in impact litigation and advocacy. Through litigation, we have fought to secure the right to housing and support services for the 15,000 patients who are discharged from City hospitals' psychiatric wards every year, and for the approximately 30,000 mentally ill inmates who are released from City jails every year.

Rights for Imprisoned People with Psychiatric Disabilities (RIPPD) was able to move on from their work at the Mental Health Project to flourish as an independent nonprofit organization. They will continue to advocate for the rights of imprisoned people with psychiatric disabilities.

SOCIAL INSECURITY

On October 26, 2007, the Mental Health Project released a report attacking the Social Security Administration's "Fugitive Felons Program." According to the report, under the pretext of law enforcement, the Social Security Administration has terminated the benefits for thousands of harmless retired and disabled Americans without aiding law enforcement, and disproportionately harming people with severe mental illness. Specifically, under this program, the Social Security Administration suspends the benefits of people who are NOT wanted by the police; NOT fleeing felons; and NOT violating probation or parole.

The SSA's method of identifying people to suspend their benefits — by mindlessly matching names found in faulty databases — results in incorrect matches.

LITIGATION

Messiah S. v. Alexander

On February 22, 2007, MHP filed a class action lawsuit, Messiah S. v. Alexander, challenging the lack of pre-release services, also known as discharge planning, for people with psychiatric disabilities being released from New York State prisons. Pre-release services are meant to help prisoners transition back into the community by connecting them to treatment, medications, housing, and public benefits. Without these supportive services, many individuals decompensate, become homeless, and eventually return to jail. We estimate that there are currently more than 6,000 individuals either awaiting release to New York City or on parole who should have received these pre-release services.

Clark v. Barnhart

The Mental Health Project filed its first national class action lawsuit, Clark v. Barnhart, on December 26, 2006. The suit has the potential to restore Social Security benefits to tens of thousands of disabled and retired Americans. The Social Security Administration (SSA) currently suspends the benefits of people who appear to have failed to comply with probation or parole, e.g. by missing an appointment. To decide whose benefits to cut, SSA uses a crude computer-match system and doesn't find out whether people actually violated probation or parole. Nor does SSA double-check to guard against mistaken identity and identity-theft. People with psychiatric disabilities are especially vulnerable because they often have a harder time dealing with SSA bureaucracy and they are more likely to have had interactions with the police.

Peter Cicchino Youth Project

The Peter Cicchino Youth Project serves some of the most vulnerable children in New York City - poor and homeless lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender youth. Many of our clients have been thrown out of their home and forced to survive on the streets because their parents could not accept their sexual orientation. They have faced violence and mistreatment at school and in the streets because of who they are. There are an estimated 23,000 homeless young people in New York City, and 40% of those are thought to be lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender.

We address these problems through a combination of direct legal services for individuals and initiatives to improve the institutions where our kids struggle to survive. We conduct three legal clinics at drop-in centers for homeless young people, one of which has been running continuously for eleven years. Every year we handle 350 cases on behalf of over 200 youth. We deal with matters ranging from applying for legal immigration status to appealing disability benefits denials to legal name changes for transgender youth.

42% OF HOMELESS YOUTH SELF-IDENTIFY AS GAY OR LESBIAN

For several years, PCYP has fought to improve the conditions for LGBT youth in the juvenile justice system. In April 2007, the New York State Office of Children and Family Services invited PCYP and other advocates to join a working group on LGBT youth in juvenile justice facilities. We are now working together with the state agency to create an anti-discrimination policy and a staff training program to eliminate mistreatment of LGBT youth in New York's juvenile detention facilities.

25% OF LGBT TEENS ARE REJECTED BY THEIR PARENTS WHEN THEY COME OUT

Sex Workers Project

The Sex Workers Project (SWP) provides legal services and legal training, and engages in documentation and policy advocacy, for sex workers. The Sex Workers Project works in the following areas: criminal justice reform; trafficking in persons; and human rights documentation. Using a harm reduction and human rights model, we protect the rights and safety of sex workers who by choice, circumstance, or coercion remain in the industry.

At an individual level, the Sex Workers Project represents 75 sex workers a year in legal cases that range from criminal advocacy to immigration claims. We use documentation-based advocacy, policy analysis, training and education, and collaboration with community-based service providers to advance practical, long-term solutions to the problems faced by this vulnerable and marginalized population.

The Sex Workers Project provides critical information to policy makers, activists, and the media on the human rights abuses faced by sex workers and those who are at risk for engaging in sex work. The Sex Workers Project has spearheaded a communications strategy to educate the media, service organizations, and the public in order to put a human face on sex work.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS HUMAN RIGHTS DOCUMENTATION

In the summer of 2007, the Sex Workers Project released a Media Toolkit on Sex Work and Human Rights. The goal is to improve public education by putting a face on sex work and accurately representing sex work as a human rights issue. There has been positive and enthusiastic feedback at the various venues where we have presented the Toolkit this summer. These include the forums in New York and Washington DC on human rights and public health issues, US Social Forum in Atlanta, an international conference on sexual rights in Lima, the Sistersong Conference on Reproductive Justice in Chicago, and a sex workers rights conference in San Francisco.

The Sex Workers Project and our partner organizations in the NY Anti-Trafficking Network played a pivotal role in the passage of the NYS anti-trafficking legislation in 2007. We had advocated for over two years for the passage of targeted and effective legislation that would make New York State a frontrunner in creating comprehensive protection of trafficking victims. Our on-the-ground experience with clients provided a unique perspective for legislators and policymakers.

Street Vendor Project

$12,000 IS THE
MEDIAN NET INCOME FOR VENDORS

The community of street vendors, the services and vitality they provide, are part of what makes this city great, and rarely are they appreciated for it. Vendors are often poor people with little political influence, facing some of the most powerful groups in the city – big business owners, real estate developers and the police. The Street Vendor Project is a voice for more than 12,000 people who have never before had an organization working on their behalf, and who have therefore been taken advantage of for more than 100 years.

The Street Vendor Project works to give vendors a fair chance to achieve the American dream. We reach out to vendors on the street and hold clinics to educate vendors about their legal rights. We hold monthly meetings to get vendors involved in the political system that affects their livelihood. We help link vendors with small business training and loans. Finally, we bring lawsuits and publish reports to help policy makers understand the important role of street vendors in the life of our city.

Currently, we have more than 650 members, to whom we provide legal support and education. Our work, however, doesn't end at the curb. We believe a vital part of helping vendors is rallying the support of the millions of New Yorkers whose lives would be diminished by their absence.

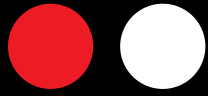

THERE ARE MORE THAN 12,000 STREET VENDORS IN NEW YORK CITY – hot dog vendors, flower vendors, book vendors, shoe shiners, street artists, and many others. They are small business people struggling to make ends meet. Most are recent immigrants and people of color. They work long hours under harsh conditions, asking for nothing more than a chance to sell their goods and services on the public sidewalk.

SVP GOES GLOBAL

After years of working at the local level, the Street Vendor Project was accepted for membership into StreetNet, an international coalition of street and market vendors stretching from Bangladesh to Zimbabwe. StreetNet aims to build vendor organizations' visibility, to share information, defend vendors' rights and to build capacity to negotiate with local governments on the laws, policies and regulations that affect informal trade.
